<sup>2</sup> Northern Ireland: In 1994, a paramilitary ceasefire came into effect in August 1994. It ended in February 1996.

<sup>3</sup> Portugal: The definition of homicide is large and includes all cases where such a possibility cannot be ruled out at the time incidents are recorded in statistics (i.e. at the end of the month), even if death was more likely due to suicide or an accident. This explains why completed homicide is, according to police statistics, several times as high as homicide according to health statistics.

<sup>4</sup> Northern Ireland: In 1994, a paramilitary ceasefire came into effect in August 1994. It ended in February 1996.

<sup>7</sup> Finland: since 1995, the scope of assault was widened where the offence took place in a private place.

<sup>8</sup> The figures for France include only cases where the bodily injury caused inability to work for at least 8 days.

<sup>10</sup> In Lithuania, the definition of robbery was extended (from January 1st, 1995) to certain acts ("open theft") which before were considered as thefts only.

<sup>18</sup> Netherlands: Drug offences are usually not prosecuted if the offence concerns small quantities and/or for personal use. Thus, the figures given here refer almost exclusively to drug trafficking.

Notes on table 1.B.1.1 to 1.B.1.15

Germany: The figures for Germany and 1990 refer to the territory of the former Federal Republic of Germany including West Berlin, i.e. without the former German Democratic Republic. The figures from 1991 refer to the actual territory of united Germany. However, organizational problems related to the transition led to serious undercounts of offences in 1991 and 1992.

Latvia: There were several changes in offence definitions in 1993-94 which might have affected the numbers of recorded offences.
